

Where to draw the line

When it comes to raising kids, the parents play a major role obviously. But what do you do when you are the eldest in the house, amongst your brothers and sisters. Where do you draw the line?

This is a question asked by all those elder brothers and sisters around the world who really care about their siblings. But what happens when you cross the line from being a bro to a father? Where does the respect go from that point on forward is just something very dangerous for that relationship.

I am the eldest among my siblings and sometimes when I define some rules at home which dad is too soft to establish, it makes things go a bit up and down. So from now onwards I will focus on being a brother rather than being a dad because tested and proven methods don't work when the head of the house isn't strict like you :)

So what about you? If you are the young one in your family.. how do you want your eldest bro or sis to behave with you? And if you are the eldest what do you do?